Grain

Grain is the foundation of Idaho's agricultural economy. The state is one of the top producers of wheat, barley, and potatoes in the United States. These grains are used to make a variety of products, including flour, pasta, bread, beer, and whiskey.

One of the most iconic Idaho foods is the potato. Idaho potatoes are known for their fluffy texture and mild flavor. They are enjoyed in a variety of dishes, from mashed potatoes to french fries to baked potatoes.

Another important grain crop in Idaho is barley. Barley is used to make malt, which is an essential ingredient in beer. Idaho is home to a number of craft breweries, and many of them use locally-grown barley to make their beer.

Glass

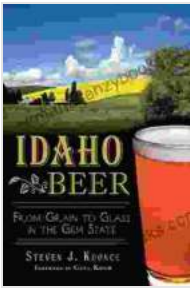

Idaho is also home to a thriving craft beer and wine industry. The state's craft breweries produce a wide variety of beers, from light and refreshing ales to dark and malty stouts. Idaho's wineries produce a variety of wines, including red, white, and sparkling wines.

The Gem State's craft beer and wine scene is centered around the city of Boise. Boise is home to a number of breweries and wineries, and it is a popular destination for beer and wine lovers from all over the country.
